WESTERN HEMISPHERE

In Latin America the United States funds physical security and stockpile management programs in Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Peru, and the Caribbean region to improve the security and management of munitions stockpiles, disrupt the diversion and illicit trafficking of small arms and light weapons, and reduce the risk of catastrophic unplanned explosions at munition storage sites. These programs strengthen civilian security, make it more difficult for drug traffickers, criminal gangs, and terrorists to obtain weapons from poorly secured stockpiles, and bolster the integrity of the U.S. southern border. In addition to addressing the illicit proliferation of weapons, the United States provides humanitarian demining assistance to Colombia, which remains the country most heavily affected by landmines in the Americas. Explosive hazards continue to threaten the livelihood of Colombians, making it difficult for families to safely return to their homes and disrupting the restoration of local economies. Since 2016, demining operations have expanded into previously inaccessible locations, thanks to the Government of Colombia's peace accord with the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC).

Since 1993, the U.S. conventional weapons destruction program has invested more than $291 million in Latin America and the Caribbean to strengthen civilian safety by disrupting the diversion and illicit trafficking of small arms and light weapons, destroying excess and obsolete munitions, clearing contaminated land to enable economic development, and providing explosive ordnance risk education to prevent civilian injuries.
