Federal Student Aid Sites Changing
By: Brad Barnett, Financial Aid Director

Federal Student Aid (FSA) is changing how students and parents access information about the federal aid programs. StudentAid.gov is now the primary website. The following websites have been consolidated under this site:

- StudentLoans.gov
- FSAID.ed.gov
- NSLDS.ed.gov
- FAFSA.gov

For the foreseeable future, all of the existing websites consolidated under StudentAid.gov will be redirected to new site if anyone attempts to use them, so the student and parent experience will hopefully be uninterrupted while this transition takes place.

According to an announcement from FSA, “Research we conducted on common pain points experienced by our customers revealed that many users find FSA’s multiple, inconsistently branded websites confusing and frustrating. Consolidating the most-visited customer-facing sites helps address this pain point, creating a single, digital front door through which all FSA information and services can be found. Along with launching this single front door, StudentAid.gov will also include an updated interface that puts important information up front and provides more intuitive access to information.”

In conjunction with the website changes, FSA also debuted a singular contact number 1-800-4-FED-AID, and posted a video at https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=I1O6lpMUDqY to provide more information about this change.
