

No Household Symptoms

PHOTO ESSAY BY: COLE RICHARDSON

Makeshift barricades and police officers patrol a closed outdoor mall.

A masked man considers his paper towel options.

The national toilet paper shortage has prompted retailers to monitor customer activity

According to the news, it seems as if the world is crumbling around us. The economy has taken a record breaking hit, citizens aren't allowed to leave their homes, colleges are closed, and toilet paper is all but a myth. Despite all this, household life has remained surprisingly average. Even the laundry needs to be done in the apocalypse. My sister can be seen baking in the picture above, which isn't out of the ordinary from a regular weekend or homework-light night.

The onset of COVID-19 is not all bad. Due to a slightly increased amount of free time, my family has taken up several different card games.

My dog has no idea anything is different. He's just happy everyone is home.