The James Madison Undergraduate Research Journal (JMURJ) is a peer-reviewed undergraduate research journal dedicated to promoting, publishing, and sharing the excellent scholarly research produced by undergraduates in all James Madison University disciplines.

Promote, Publish, and Share

JMURJ works to connect James Madison University’s undergraduate researchers in all fields of study with their peers, their school, and their community. JMURJ strives to launch students into the research field beyond just their undergraduate careers, invest them in the publishing process and editing work involved in publishing their research, share their voices across all disciplines in a multimedia format, and enlighten the JMU community in and out of the classroom.

An Inclusive, Multimedia Scope

JMURJ invites submissions from any current or recent JMU undergraduate student, in text- and multimedia-based formats, from any academic program and field of study at JMU.

The Editorial Board

The undergraduate editors of the JMURJ Editorial Board coordinate a university-wide effort. JMURJ editors collaborate in three editorial teams to advance the journal’s mission: outreach, acquisitions, and marketing; comprehensive editing and proofreading; and publication and design.

Editorial board members gain experience in defining and publishing the growing university-wide academic research journal; collaborating with a diverse group of enthusiastic, skilled editorial board members; and working with people and texts from various fields.

The Faculty Review Board

The journal also depends on a growing team of faculty reviewers who offer their time and disciplinary expertise. Reviewers serve in JMURJ’s double-blind peer review process to evaluate submissions in their discipline. Faculty Review Board members serve in the review process in addition to helping promote JMURJ throughout the university.
